"I went in for a routine check-up and my doctor asked if there was anything bothering me. Less than 48 hours later, they were removing bladder cancer. I never thought it was anything serious, and thankfully, now it's not."

Our doctors are trained observers and skilled listeners.

It takes more than medicine to help people feel better. So at The Everett Clinic, we practice what we call compassionate care.

For starters, our doctors receive advanced training in patient communication. We've even designed our own program, called Listening Well.

Our physicians take the time to sit down with you and really learn about your medical needs and concerns. With this active listening approach, your doctor invites you to be part of a shared decision-making process. We have found that this collaboration engages you to be an active and informed part of your healing treatment.
